RESISTS ARREST; A DALHART MAN KILLED

Dalhart, Texas, Sept. 8.—Sheriff John F. McCannless, in making the arrest of Herman Pasteur at Ware, 14 miles north of Dalhart last evening, shot and instantly killed him.

The warrant had been issued against the man for carrying a gun. McCannless arrested him and demanded his gun. Pasteur made an effort to shoot first, it is said, but was not quick enough with the trigger, and was killed by the sheriff.

Coroner Farrow, of Dalhart, was taken to Ware in an automobile, where an inquest was held, and sheriff McCannless exonerated.

It was too late in the campaign to substitute another name in his place, and Chas. H. Crownhart, manager of the LaFollette campaign, sent word to voters throughout the state to cast their suffrage for Tucker, with the idea of having the state central committee later substitute another man in Tucker's place.

According to the jury the shot was "fired by a hand unknown." It was found the blow dealt by Stewart was serious but not fatal. The bandit has not been identified.

GALVESTON IS BETTER CITY THAN EVER

Eight Years Ago City Was Practically Destroyed by Great Flood.

MANY EL PASOANS WERE THERE THEN

Ten years ago today, Sept. 8, 1900, Texas was thrown into a panic of fear. The great storm which broke over Galveston was breaking over the island city and thousands of human beings, caught like rats in a trap, were cut off from the mainland and drowned before the storm subsided and aid could reach the unfortunate city on the Mexican gulf. Starting in the forenoon, the storm raged during the entire day and by nightfall the city of shipping was practically submerged by the meeting of the boiling waters from the gulf and from the bay.

In the union station in Galveston is engraved a motto: "Galveston, a city not born to die." Galveston still lives. With a spirit stronger than the storm king, Galveston fought the elements and conquered. Today, with a sea wall that is the marvel of engineers the world over, and which has stood the crucial test of another storm, Galveston stands as a monument to the conquering power of mind over matter. Rebuilt more beautiful than it was in what Galveston people refer to as "the old Galveston," with its grade raised above the danger from another storm submerging, a concrete causeway now being built across the bay, its residences rebuilt, the palm drives restored and the wharves rebuilt to accommodate the ocean liners of the greatest capacity, truly Galveston is a city not born to die.

John Fisher's Family There.
John W. Fisher, the former proprietor of the Sheldon hotel, opened the Sheldon the day following the terrible storm. Mr. Fisher's home was in Galveston before he came to El Paso and his family was in Galveston at the time of the flood. When the festivities incident to the formal opening of the big hotel were at their height, the message, delayed in transit because of the lack of wire facilities, was received. Many El Pasoans had friends and relatives in Galveston at the time of the flood and the announcement of disaster almost created a panic here.

El Pasoans in Flood.
Ole Olsen, who lives in Highland Park, far above the reach of flood waters, is one of the El Pasoans who was in the Galveston flood. Mr. Olsen escaped on the roof of a house and was seriously injured by being battered about by the water.

Chet Dean, who lives in Altura Park and is employed as a barber at Vardy Puckett's shop on Mills street also had a harrowing experience in the flood in which he lost all his household effects.

Herald Janitor There.
A. R. Jones, the janitor of The Herald building, was in Galveston at the time of the flood and has as a souvenir of the fatal flood a pass issued by the commander of the troops which had placed the town under martial law. Jones was a store guard at a big wholesale clothing firm in Galveston. The pass was issued by command of Gen. Scurry, who was in command of the troops. The pass permitted the bearer to go through the lines and was used by him during the reign of martial law in Galveston.

BURGLARS BREAK IN BABY'S BANK

Joe Kopf's Residence Burglarized While Family Is Downtown.

It was a low lived bunch of sneak thieves that broke into Joseph Kopf's home on Gladstone street Tuesday afternoon. To begin with they waited until Mr. Kopf was at work, and Mrs. Kopf was down town shopping before they attempted to enter the house. Then, after cutting a screen door, and letting all of the flies in the neighborhood into the Kopf kitchen, they broke a French door, cutting their hands so that they left their blood stains in different parts of the house, all of which served them right, says Joe.

But the sneakiest part of the whole performance was the way they treated little Joseph Jr. Little Joe has been reading in The Herald of the coming of the circus and the big fair. He has been putting his nickels away in a baby bank, having deposited two $1 bills that his grandmother had given him, in this same depository or depository, whichever it is. Along came the bold, bad bandits, broke open little Joe's bank and took every single cent he had saved for circus day.

A quantity of clothing, some valuable antique jewelry which were heirlooms of Mrs. Kopf's and other valuables were taken from the house. The thieves went through every room from the cellar to the garret, including a number of trunks in the attic. The robbery was committed between 4 and 5 o'clock Tuesday afternoon. The city detectives are working on the case.

TWO DEPOSED POLICEMEN SECURE OTHER POSITIONS

Policemen Harry Cherry and Ivy Finley, who were deposed by mayor Kelly on Sept. 1, are again employed. Cherry is now relief motorman on the union station car line and Ivy Finley is a deputy constable, succeeding deputy constable Henry Hinckley, who has resigned. Mr. Hinckley is acting as interpreter for the grand jury, when it is in session. The body will convene Friday morning.

MEETING OF FAIR DIRECTORS

Owing to the fact that a number of the directors of the Fair association are out of the city, the announced meeting of the association was not held Wednesday afternoon. A meeting will be held as soon as possible, when the drilling contest and other features of the fair will be decided upon by the directors.
